Mainasila. If the ashes of the khas-grass mixed with oil are put in the water, the water will become as white as milk. Iron pots assume the colour of copper if plastered with the paste of the leaves of Harītaka (also called Caṭacaṭa) and Āmrātaka added with Śravaṇapriyaṅgukā. The wick made of the cloth taken together with the slough of a serpent, is burned in a lamp with oil of Śravaṇapriyaṅgukā, makes the woods placed on its sides look like serpents. Drinking milk of a white cow who has white calf also increases fame and longevity. So does the blessings of praiseworthy brahmins (32-51).

This Kāmasūtra is composed in a condensed form with due efforts after consulting the earlier Śāstras and following the practices (52).

A person who understands the essence of it visualises (the real nature of) dharma, artha, kāma, faith and the world, and then he is not driven by passion (53).

The unusual prescriptions to be applied for increasing passion, described in a context in this text, instructions have carefully been given for prohibiting them here it self. (54).

Everything does not become practicable because there is a Śāstra dealing with it. The contents of the Śāstra cover the whole and the practices adopt just a part of it (55).

Vātsyāyana has composed this Kāmasūtra with due methodology (of a Śāstra) after understanding the formulae of Bābhavya's text and after duly considering them (56).

This Śāstra has ben composed with due observance of celibacy and meditation for regulating human life, its practices are not meant for enhancement of passions. (57).

Maintaining the due status of Dharma, Artha and Kāma in his life in this world, a man who understands the essence of this Śāstra becomes a conqueror of sensuous pleasures (58).

If a skillful and knowledgeable man, abiding by dharma, artha, and kāma desiring pleasures of love, and not indulging too much in passion, practices this (Kāmasūtra), he succeeds in life (59).

*Here ends the second chapter on reviving lost passion, prescriptions for increasing the size (of penis) and peculiar devices in the in the VII book on the secrets in Kāmasūtra of Vātsyāyana.
